WASHINGTON, July 9-The new first assistant postmaster-general starts in like a veteran, and demonstrates at once his fitness for the place. He has all of Mr. Hays' aptitude for affairs, with the best of health and the physique of a giant. He can dispose of, in in the place he occupies is that very shortly now it will be the place of all others to which Democrats will look for relief from the reign of Republican officers.

The State, War and Navy Departments can in no time completely change the personnel of their employes. The Department of Justice is making very commendable progress in turning the Republicans out, as is the Interior Department. The Treasury patronage throughout the country is still too much controlled by the opposition, but it only requires the swift exercise of a good Democrat to soon set everything right. But in the Postoffice Department there are so many thousands of places scattered all over the country that let the work go on ever so dilligently there must necessarily be consumed a great deal of time in making all the changes. So many papera will have to be examined and so many representative men consulted in order that everything may be done for department in the way of taking offices out of the hands of the enemies and putting them into the hands of the friends of the administration.
